THE MANHATTAN LEDGER

WHERE IS SPIDER-MAN?

The city's masked protector has not been seen for three nights

A figure crosses Midtown in the last image the Ledger's picture desk could verify. Ledger file photo.

For the first time in years, the emergency scanners went quiet in a way nobody here finds comforting. Three nights have passed since anyone reliably reported seeing Spider-Man, and police say no calls have come in from the rooftops he usually patrols.

Precinct officers described a run of robberies that ended without the familiar web lines hanging from the streetlights. One sergeant, who was not authorised to speak publicly, said only that the night shift had started to notice.

City Hall declined to comment. A spokesperson repeated that the department does not coordinate with masked individuals and has no information about any one person's whereabouts.

Reporter MJ Watson, who has followed the story from the start, said the timeline being repeated around the city does not hold together. Her reporting continues on page 3.

NO TWO ACCOUNTS AGREE

Witnesses place the last sighting hours and miles apart

The bridge crew. A maintenance team working a late shift says it saw a figure swing past the east tower shortly after midnight on the first night. Two members of the crew are certain of the time. A third says it may have been later.

The delivery driver. A courier crossing downtown insists the sighting came just before dawn, some five hours after the bridge crew's account and on the other side of the island.

The rooftop camera. A residential building's security camera recorded a shadow crossing at 02:40. The footage is too dark to identify anyone, and the clock on the system had not been corrected for months.

The diner regulars. A group at an all-night diner says it saw nothing at all, though their window faces the block where several others claim the chase ended.

Taken together, the accounts cannot all be right. That has not stopped each version from being repeated online as settled fact, and the differences have only grown as the days pass.

Readers with first-hand information are asked to contact the city desk. Please include the time and place of what you saw, and how you know the time.

THE ARTICLE THAT CHANGED

MJ Watson's investigation turns to the Ledger's own archive

While comparing witness accounts, MJ Watson went back to her own published report, filed in the archive as article NY-204. The text she found was not the text she remembered submitting.

The passage in question concerned the time and place of the final confirmed sighting. Her notes recorded one version. The archive displayed another, worded so plainly that few readers would have thought to question it.

Watson asked the desk who had approved the edit. No one had. No editor recalled the change, and it did not appear on the day's list of approved corrections.

The archive keeps its own records, she noted, including which sessions opened and changed each article. The records do not name people, but a session does not appear from nowhere.

Before she stopped answering calls, Watson told a colleague she intended to copy the records out of the system and go through them line by line. Her recovered files are now with this newspaper.

ARCHIVE CORRECTION NOTICE

Issued by the records office

Article affected: NY-204.

Finding: A review of the newsroom archive shows that the stored text of article NY-204 was modified at 09:22 without editorial approval. The modification did not pass through the normal corrections process.

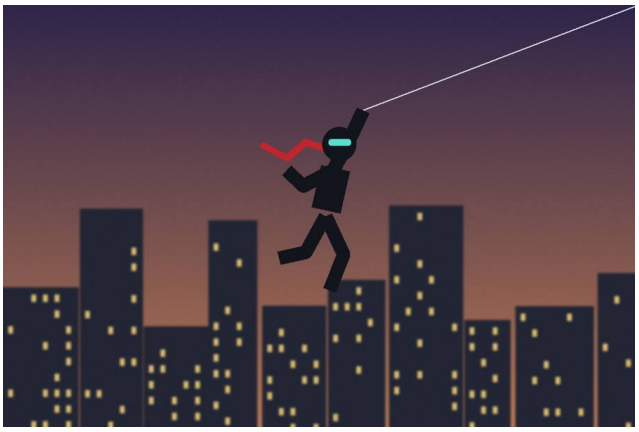

Status: The records office has preserved the archive access records, revision history and system login records from that morning for review. No conclusion is drawn in this notice about who was responsible.

The Ledger regrets any confusion caused to readers. The original text of NY-204 will be restored once the review is complete.

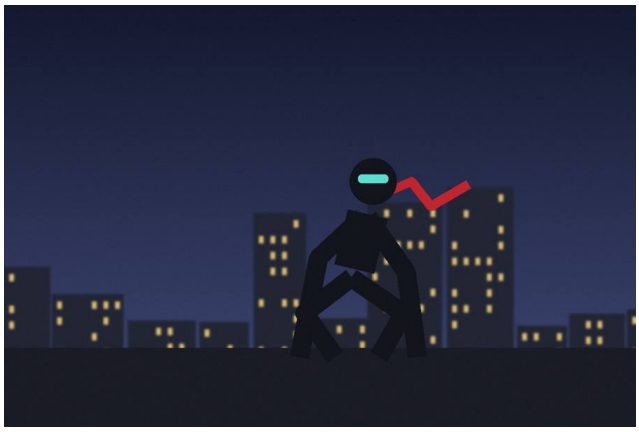

Other notices. The archive will undergo routine metadata synchronisation on weekday mornings. Staff may notice brief slowdowns. The picture desk reminds contributors to submit original files with captions.

THREE NIGHTS IN PICTURES

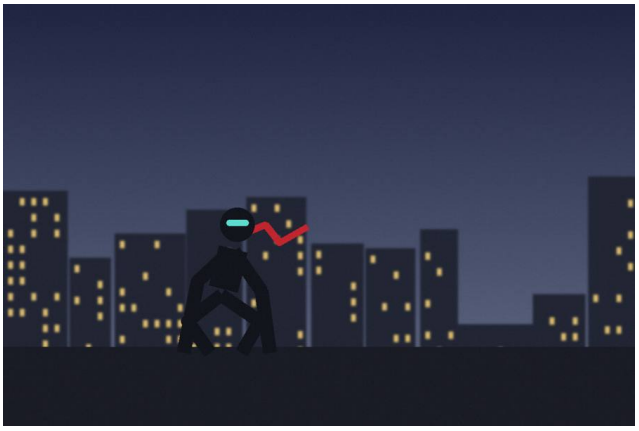

Images from the Ledger's picture desk

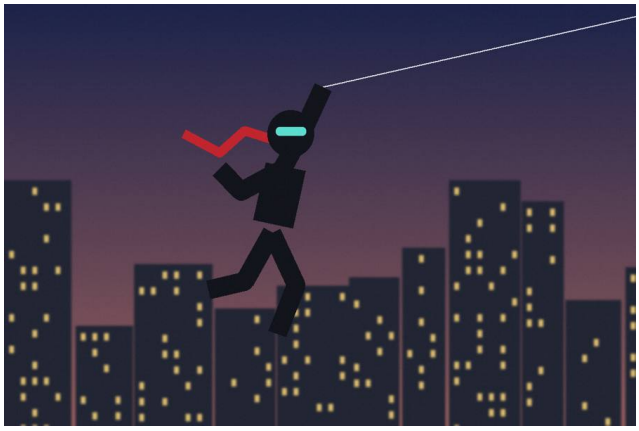

Dusk over the avenues. A reader sent this photograph of Spider-Man on the first evening.

A rooftop in the small hours. The picture desk could not confirm the date.

Spider-Man keeps watch at the end of the line. The next transmission remains trapped in the archive cache. Remove mj_cache.tmp to restore access.

Midtown, seen from the river side. Ledger file photo.